The story of our tomorrow?

There is the tomorrow we can live in. Getting to that tomorrow and of course the day after that tomorrow, requires us to live our todays in a particular kind of way. We have forgotten and/or suppressed that other way of being, of becoming, of living in harmony, with simplicity, with thrift, modesty and humility. Instead we've opted for arrogance, mindless competition, ignorance and wastefulness.

The park therefore is a repository of biodiversity as well as lessons we would do well to learn if we want to bequeath this earth to our children in a habitable manner.

It won't be just another herbal garden with some additional plants to enhance overall diversity. It will be laid out in a manner that facilitates research and contributes to an overall educational experience. There will be particular emphasis laid on sustainable models that are replicable at various levels, from home gardening plots to more ambitious commercial production in ways that do not compromise fertility, ecological balance etc.

It is that wish, that hope and extrapolation of a different and better tomorrow that we marry with the past in this park. This is the 'intersection' referred to.
